This research aims to develop DNA chip array without an indicator. We fabricated microelectrode array by photolithography technology. Several DNA probes were immobilized on an electrode. Then, indicator-free target DNA was hybridized by an electrical force and measured electrochemically. Cyclic-voltammograms (CVs) showed a difference between DNA probe and mismatched DNA in an anodic peak. Immobilization of probe DNA and hybridization of target DNA could be confirmed by fluorescent. This indicator-free DNA chip microarray resulted in the sequence-specific detection of the target DNA quantitatively ranging from 10^{-18} M to 10^{-5} M in the buffer solution. This indicator-free DNA chip resulted in a sequence-specific detection of the target DNA.

Introduction

The development of DNA chips, miniaturized arrays of immobilized single-strand DNA, is motivated by their potential applications in disease diagnosis and genome sequencing.^{1,2} In an array-based sensor, DNA probes of varying sequence are immobilized on a surface where the location of each probe is known. DNA diagnostics are performed by exposing the array to a solution containing single-strand DNA of unknown sequence, the target, that can be labeled with a fluorescent³ or a radioactive marker. The sequence of the target is determined by imaging the array and correlating the position of "hot spots" with a probe sequence.

DNA-based sensors have potential applications that range from genomic sequencing to mutation detection and pathogen identification.^{1,4,5} Conventional DNA chip systems employ confocal fluorescence detection.⁷⁻¹⁰ Fluorescent detection DNA chips and microarray scanners are too expensive to use. Electrochemical detection is superior to fluorescent detection as regards the cost, portability and convenience. Recently, electrochemical DNA sensors¹¹⁻¹⁵ have been developed using electrochemically active intercalators. The above mentioned researches have been performed using fluorescent substances or indicators. Theop^{16,17} used Ru (bpy)₃2+ (bpy=2,2'-bipyridine) as a detection marker for hybridization reaction and detected a single base pair mismatch.

Steel⁸ and Hahn¹⁸ et al. have reported electrochemical quantization of DNA using ferricyanide. However, no integrated multichannel electrochemical DNA sensor has been developed. Microfabrication technology has already been established and enables to advance miniaturization and mass production of DNA chips. An integrated multichannel DNA chip can be microarray and this has advantages of low-cost and high through-put.

Therefore, this research aims to develop the multi-channel label-free DNA chip array that has the above advantages to solve the problems. At first, we fabricated a DNA microarray by microfabrication technology. It is able to detect various genes electrochemically after immobilization of various probe DNAs and hybridization of label-free target DNA on the electrodes simultaneously. Probe DNAs consisting of thiol group at their 5'-end were immobilized on the gold electrodes. Then indicator-free target DNA was hybridized by an electrical force and measured electrochemically. Redox peak of cyclic-voltammogram showed a difference between target DNA and mismatched DNA in an anodic peak current. This indicator-free DNA chip microarray resulted in the sequence-specific detection of the target DNA quantitatively ranging from 10^{-18} M to 10^{-5} M in the buffer solution. It suggested that this DNA chip could recognize the sequence specific genes.
